

Thanks to our employees, customers and partners for working tirelessly to keep the world fed.

As individuals, families and communities around the world face challenges and uncertainty caused by the spread of COVID-19, we want to recognize the work happening around the clock to feed the world. At Cargill, we remain confident in the resilience, dependability and sustainability of our global food system and the agriculture sector. And that is only possible because of the contributions of everyone along the food supply chain who continue working to feed the world safely, responsibly and sustainably. This includes farmers and ranchers, our employees, our retail, manufacturing and foodservice customers, and those who move food to people and animals around the world.

Agriculture communities are the heart of our food system, and we are investing in programs and partnerships to keep them resilient throughout the pandemic and recovery. This ranges from sharing resources to keep agricultural communities safe, to supporting increased biosecurity practices, to contributing to social programs like the American Farmland Trust – Farmer Relief Fund and the Restaurant Employee Relief Fund.

Disruptions in Cargill's food supply chains have been limited, thanks to our hard-working employees who continue to operate safely in our facilities with additional precautions implemented. Whether in an office, at home or in a production facility, the food system would not work without them. During this time of crisis, we are prioritizing their health and safety while they prioritize the essential work of feeding the world.

Our commitment to doing the right thing, putting people first and reaching higher will continue to guide every decision we make. These values extend beyond our business operations to the communities where we live and work. Vulnerable children and families around the world are facing food insecurity at unprecedented levels. Our nonprofit partners, including local food banks and Action for Healthy Kids, are playing a critical role in ensuring no one goes hungry. We are supporting them with food donations exceeding 1 million pounds, as well as monetary contributions to deliver emergency food boxes to address nutrition needs.

Our thoughts are with all those who have been impacted by COVID-19, especially those who are sick and under medical care. We are inspired by the contributions of medical professionals, first responders, workers, and farmers in our communities whose selfless efforts are helping ensure that people and animals around the world are cared for and their essential needs are met. Cargill's 160,000 employees offer our thanks and continued support in overcoming this crisis and helping the world thrive.